Technology and Community (TAC)

- Using a project-based approach, the curriculum's activities and projects demonstrate to learners how technology can contribute to help improve their communities. For instance, using word processing and graphics software, learners create a calendar of notable events in their community, as well as community news articles. Using multimedia software, they create presentations that address community issues. Learners not only develop new technology skills and learn about their communities, they develop critical thinking skills as they collaborate to collect information.
Technology at Work (TAW)

- Technology at Work shows learners how computers are used in a variety of jobs and careers. Using increasingly sophisticated software tools, students create projects ranging from designing a survey that a health care worker might use to assess health needs to developing a project management plan that a local engineer might create before starting a building project.
